Every state in the United States has experienced an increase in the availability and use of prescription opioids. Between 2000 and 2010, deaths from prescription opioid overdose have more than quadrupled, from 4.5 per 100,000 to 19.3 per 100,000. In 2010, states reported that approximately 2.1 million people aged 12 and older had been prescribed opioid pain relievers. In addition, 80% of all prescribed opioids are used for long-term pain relief. Although most patients with chronic pain are able to cope with their condition, many experience severe pain. Among persons who experienced chronic pain in the last 12 months, 12% reported pain that was severe enough to interfere with most daily activities. Substance abuse is widespread in the US, not surprisingly due to the increased availability of prescription opioids. Some patients have been able to function normally and have been able to reduce or even eliminate the use of opioids. Unfortunately, many patients find that the side effects are greater than the value of the pain relief. Other patients fail to achieve adequate pain control, leading to an overall poor quality of life. The poor quality of life is largely due to the mechanism of the pharmacological action of opioids. Opioids act on the opioid receptors in the central nervous system (CNS). There are three types of opioid receptors (mu, delta, kappa) in the CNS. While the mu receptor is activated by all opioids (both therapeutic and non-therapeutic), the delta and kappa receptors are mainly activated by opioids with limited efficacy and abuse potential. These receptors can mediate a wide range of activities, including addiction, cognition, nociception, regulation of sleep/wake cycles, and reward. The therapeutic utility of opioids is closely related to the variability of their efficacy across opioid receptors and the efficiency of delivery of these agents to the target tissues. The variability of efficacy is related, in part, to the physiological blockade of opioid receptors by endogenous agonists. During chronic opioid treatment, this blockade leads to tolerance and a state of functional receptor down-regulation. The blockade of receptors by endogenous agonists creates a strong dependence on opioid therapy in patients. The tolerance is defined as the reduction in drug efficacy (i.e., the loss of analgesia) that can occur after prolonged exposure to opioids. Tolerance is different than the physical dependence that is due to withdrawal of agonists, which manifests as certain signs and symptoms of an opioid withdrawal syndrome (e.g., physical dependence, CNS excitation, seizures, etc.). The

Setting a hyphenated name to use, I get this error: Uncaught Error: Invariant Violation: The "current" prop expects a valid React element. in Invariant (created by Context.Consumer) in Consumer (at noInvariantWork) in Consumer (at noWork) in StrictMode (at noStrictModeWork) And these are how the components are named:

(Context.Consumer) {siteLayout}
(Main.Consumer)
